U.S. political handlers help sway election and offer access to Washington

BY GEORGE KATZ

When a Nigerian presidential candidate failed to win the election in May, U.S. political handlers helped sway the outcome. The candidate, who was widely expected to win, lost by a narrow margin. The U.S. political handlers, who were working for the candidate, had a significant role in the outcome. They provided the candidate with a large sum of money, which he used to buy votes. They also provided him with a large sum of money, which he used to buy votes. They also provided him with a large sum of money, which he used to buy votes.

These firms help candidates in Washington, London and New York, shifting outside attention from their companies.
